Reception

Langland

Langland is an award-winning advertising company, specialising in the pharmaceutical market. Langland took the decision to relocate and set about identifying premises that could accommodate their anticipated growth. They eventually secured 2 floors within the prestigious office design development known as 'The Quadrant' which benefits from a highly desirable position within Windsor Town Centre.

"Spine" Library

Our client said:

"It's great that the different departments have their own areas and yet they can easily traverse through the spine to get to their colleagues. The sense of team at Langland was always great, but now it's even better."

Boardroom

Langland's business environment plays a huge role in their working practices, creative activities and interaction with clients.

The design team decided early on that they wanted to invert the layout, placing all the office's main functions in the centre, within one key structure that was called the 'spinal hub'. These main functions include meeting rooms, workshop, a reference library, tele-conference rooms, post room and job bag area. The spine is the 'backbone' of the office, containing all its 'hardware'.

The Library is part social space, with the feel of a private member's club "We decided to work with the heritage of the building rather than against it," says Interiors Group design partner, Simon Jordan of Jump Studios. "Apart from internal meetings and brainstorming sessions this is where Langland bring their clients, so it made sense that this should be a more informal, elegant space with an eclectic, domestic feel."
